The commencement of the Athletic Sports took place on Thursday afternoon at 5 p.m. Not being a holiday there was only a limited attendance of some 100 persons, mostly of the sterner sex. Still, great interest was shewn in the events, which were well competed, and had the following results.—

2. Putting the Shot. (16 lbs). This was won by Alexander, the champion of former years, who was in his best form, and gained the prize, owing 6it., with a fine put of 35ft. 9 in. This put also obtains him a gold medal, the previous record being 35ft.

3. Thowing the Hammer. This interesting competition was also gained by Alexander (owing 15ft.) by a throw of 85 ft. 5 in. For this he scores another gold medal, the previous record being 75ft. It is almost a pity two such fine performances should have taken place on what may be called an off day.

4. Throwing the Cricket Ball. This was won by A. Macadam with a throw of 96 yds. 2ft. Harvey 2nd. Ellis 3rd.

Lanin, whose identity on this occasion can hardly be regarded as a secret, describes the condition of the Jows in Russia with a wealth of detail to which the writer in Blackwood can lay no claim. The article is long, able, and powerful. Here is a grim incident of which the writer speaks of his own knowledge:

«I knew a respectable young girl, of very honest parents, privileged to live in one of the capital cities. A Christian «fell in love» with her, and under pretext of giving her lessons and preparing her for admission to one of the high schools, seduced her, solemnly promising marriage. scenes of 1881 are sure to be repeated, and Europe will once more be shocked by tales of violence and outrage, of which the Jews will be the victims. #### THE FUTURE OF JAPAN

THE FUTURE OF JAPAN.

Sir Edwin Arnold, in one of his delightful letters from Japan, recently said that, within the short space of twenty years, new and enlightened criminal codes were enacted; the methods of judicial procedure were entirely changed; thoroughly efficient systems of police, of posts, of telegraphs, and of national education were organised; an army and navy, modelled after Western patterns, were placed on a sound basis; railways, roads, and harbours were constructed; an efficient mercantile marine sprang into existence; were constructed; an efficient mer-cantile marine sprang into existence; the gaol systems was radically im-proved: an extensive scheme of local self-government was put into operation; a competitive civil service was organised; the whole fiscal system was revised; an influential and widely-spread news-paper press grew up rapidly; the peoplewere enfranchised, and govern-ment by Parliament was substituted for monarchical absolutism. Many who have observed keenly the Japa-nese in their own land are inclined to doubt whether, as a whole, they will be made happier or greater by will be made happier or greater by such a change. It is to be hoped, at least, that the revolution will not extinguish or alter the peaceful, lighthearted, and picturesque genius of the most amiable of Eastern peoples.

THE CURATE OF CHURNSIDE

AJ TALE

Walter Dene stepped, pale and haggard still, into the witnessbox. He had made up his mind to make one final effort 'for Christina's happiness.' He fumbled nervously all the time at a small glass phial in his pocket, but he answered a l questions without a moment's hesitation, and he kept down his emotions with a wonderful composure which excited the admiration of everybody present. There was a general hush to hear him. Did he see the prisoner, Joseph Harley, on the day of the murder? Yes, three times. When was the first occasion? From the library window, just before the vicar left the house. What was Joseph Harley then doing? Walking in the opposite direction from the copse. Did Joseph Harley recognise him? Yes, he touched his hat to him. When was the second occasion? About ten minutes later, when, he Walter, was leaving the vicarage for a stroll. Did Joseph Harley then recognise him? Yes, he touched his hat again, and the curate said, 'Good morning, Joe; a fine day for walking.' When was the third time? Ten minutes later again, when he was returning from the lane, carrying wounded was the third time? Ten minutes later again, when he was returning from the lane, carrying wounded little King Charlie. Would it have been physically possible for the prisoner to go from the vicarage to the spot where the murder was committed, and back again, in the interval, between the first two. committed, and back again, in the interval between the first two occasions? It would not. Would it have been physically possible for the prisoner to do so in the interval between the second and third occasions? It would not. "Then in your opinion, Mr. Dene, it is physically impossible that Joseph Harley can have committed this murder?"

clie, he did not dare to look (arley once in the face; and Joe Harley listened in amant to this unexpected assistto his case—for counsel, ecting a mistaken identity, had uestioned him too closely on ubject—he had presence of enough not to let his astonent show upon his stolid er's fell in the self-fidericely, and he said to himself fiercely, and not so have debased and aded myself before any man to my own life—what is my life tina, to save Christinal I have thall this upon myself for tina's sake.

canwhile, Joe Harley was ng himself curiously what I be the meaning of this new could be the meaning of this new move on parson's part. It was deliberate perjury, Joe felt sure, for parson could not have mistaken another person for him three times over; but what good end for himselt could parson hope to gain by it? If it was he who had murdered the If it was he who had murdered the vicar (as Joe strongly suspected), why did he not try to press the charge home against the first person who happened to be accused, instead of committing a distinct perjury on purpose to compass his acquittal? Joe Harley, with his simple every-day criminal mind, could not be expected to unravel the intricacies of so complex a personality as Walter Dene's. But even there, on trial for his life, he could not help wondering what on earth young parson could be driving at in this business.

The judge summed up with the usual luminously obvious alternate my opinion, it is physically sible. ile Walter Dene solemnly amid dead silence to this lie, he did not dare to look ent show upon his stolid-res. But when Walter had led his evidence in chief, he a glance at Joe; and for a ent their eyes met. Then er's fell in utter self-humilia-platitudes. If the jury thought that John had really seen Joe Harley, and that the curate was mistaken in the person whom he thrice saw, or was mistaken once only out of the thrice, or had miscalculated the time between each occurrence, or the time necessary to cover the ground to the gate, then they would find the prisoner guilty of wilful murder. If, on the other hand, they believed John had judged hastily, and that the curate had really seen the prisoner three separate times, and that he had rightly calculated all the intervals then they would find the prisoner not guilty. The prisoner's case rested entirely upon the alibi. Supposing they thought there was a doubt in the matter, they should give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. Walter noticed that the judge said in every other case, 'If you believe the witness So-and-so,' but that in his case he made no such discourteous reservation. As a matter of fact, the one person whose conduct nobody for a moment dreamt of calling in question was the real murderer.

The jury retired for more than an hour. During all that time two men stood there in mortal suspense, intent and haggard, both upon their trial, but not both equally. The prisoner in the dock fixed his arms in a dogged and sullen attitude, the colour half gone from his brown cheek, and his eyes straining with excitement, but showing no outward sign of any emotion except the craven fear of death. Walter Dene stood almost fainting in the body of the court, his bloodless fingers still fumbling nervously at the little phial, and his face deadly pale with the awful pallor of a devouring horror. His heart scarcely beat at all, but at each long slow pulsation he could feel it throb distinctly within his bosom. He saw or heard nothing before him, but kept his aching eyes fixed steadily on the door by which the jury were to enter. Junior counsel nudged one another to notice his agitation, and
