HIGH-LIFE MURDER.

The chief distinction between the sa perty of life. This has been found true in most ages and in most climes, even, with but few vise our readers to join us in uttering exceptions, amongst people generally the grand words of the English Church regarded as but little civilized. To take of England Liturgy, From baltle, murthe life of an enemy, of a stranger or der and sudden death, Good Lord, deli-5 foreigner whom ignorance may regard rer us! as an enemy, to kill a man in fair fight and with equal arms, to sacrifice life in obedience to religious zeal or to the commands of a king or other authority invested by superstition with divine right, these are at least intelligible. slaughter, in cold blood, without pretext to come home at the end of the present to be discharged 1000 will be hired men. and in the most cowardly fashion. another man, a fellow citizen in the year of his term of office. The soldier, the duellist might be a hero or a man of honour. The assassin was nover aught but a bruto and a blackguard. The other newspapers of this city have almost unanimously raised their voices in sovere condemnation, not only of the unhappy ill-trained youth now in prison but also of his no less savage father who by the incredible brutality with which he sought to increase his sons erimes, participates in them. It is only o be regretted that some of the pipers, made this loathsome incident a peg each employing from three to 40 hands placing party before morality, have whereon to hang expressions of party

But newspaper condemnation, however general and severe, is not sufficient. No printed expression of opinion is strong enough to reach men like these, but brute force. A terrible example is absolute necessary and should be insisted men are leaving the town. on without remorse. The «gilded youth» of this country, amongst whom it is to be feared such as the murderer of Thursday are not exceptional, are only too fond of the revolver and the knife-the weapons of the assassin and the coward. in the sternest manner not only the unutterable disgnst and horror with which the use of these murderous weapons inspires all decent civilized men, but also the infinite mischief and preju-

If our capital is to be counted amongst civilized cities, if she is to be regarded as fit to rank with European capitals, if she is to be looked upon as a habitat for decent civilized people, our young bloods, rage and the brute creature, a distinction the «compadritos» and sievenes conocithat is found in a still higher degree dos as they delight to call themselves, between the civilized man and the save must be taught with no light or hesitaago is regard for property in others, es- ting hand, to abandon this blackguardly pecially for that property which to each use of the knife and revolver, to behave man is the most precious of all—the pro- like educated human beings and not like brutes, ruffians and savages.

The right honourable gentleman said that having been absent from the House of Commons last year he spoke with diffidence on the subject. The main objects which the Government would probably propose would be to put an end to the comparative impunity which insolent and disorderly language enjoyed in the House of Commons and to enable the House to do its own business within reasonable hours. He was of opinion that the power of the Speaker might be extended to was more complicated. It was clear that further changes would be required if the adoption of a fixed hour of closing the debate was to have a good effect. He had always felt considerable objection to the closure pure and simple. Repliying to Lord Salisbury's remarks as to the traditionapolicy towards Ireland, he said that English policy towards Ireland was the greatest blot on English history. Englishmen were becoming ashamed of it, and desired that Irishmen should be treated as fairly as Englishmen. He charged the Tories with trying to combine with Mr. Parnel's followers to get into office, and then making an alliance with the Liberal Unionists to keep it. He referred to the enthusiastic reception given to Mr. Morley and Lord Ripon in Dublin as expressing the sentiments of the Irish peoof Mr. Blunt and the Irish leaders, These matters would have to be discussed in Parliament, and if that arena were closed they would arraign the Government on every platform in the country; and he the triumphant issue of a policy of jus-
